THOUGHT FOR THE WEEK: The Assault on Christianity by Paul Walker:

The Provost of Glasgow's Episcopal Church, St. Mary's Cathedral, as a form of multicult interfaith, or whatever, replaced a reading from the Bible with a reading from the Koran, at the Eucharist of the Feast of the Epiphany. The reading was Surah 19 which is a famous passage denying the divinity of Christ:

http://www.heraldsun.com.au/blogs/andrew-bolt/queens-chaplain-sacked-for-defending-christianity/news-story/b157863491edf6ce2a2c83725501fc9a

Here is the passage reference: http://www.noblequran.com/translation/surah19.html

The passage was enthusiastically read by a Muslim law student, who then placed the video on YouTube:

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=BCXgjWfsmIY

Chaplain Gavin Ashenden protested about this, pointing out the obvious absurdity in the affair. However, "after a conversation instigated by officials at Buckingham Palace", Ashenden decided to resign as a Queen's chaplain, so he could freely comment. He was not sacked as such, but under the circumstances, had to resign.

He stated: "the Queen should not be drawn into public affairs where she is deemed to be taking a position," which includes matters such as the assault on Christianity, even if she is Fidei Defensor. ***

THE BREAK-UP OF AUSTRALIA: ABORIGINAL RECOGNITION, TREATIES AND RACIAL SEPARATISM

by Ian Wilson LL.B.: Australia Day, January 26, is basically the Aussie equivalent of America's Fourth of July. It is called "Invasion Day" by the usual university types, leftoids and radical Left Aboriginalists. In Sydney this year, a man tried to burn the Australian flag, and violence erupted with protestors duplicating Black Lives matter-style battles with police. See the action shots here: http://www.news.com.au/national/nsw-act/news/violence-at-invasion-day-protest-in-sydney/news-story/5501ab73659c57e2a2936cf24eaac591 The protestors see Australia as an illegitimate nation, founded on invasion (which makes most nations illegitimate), a "day of killing" and of "genocide" which is "still going on today."

It seems that the majority of the protestors were whites, as we have come to expect from the 1960s on, the offspring of those who committed genocide.

Should they therefore engage in acts of "self-punishment" as comfortable US academics have advised their students, while these academics sit back and feel morally superior? Should they emigrate from Australia, and to where? Should all of the infrastructure and buildings in Australia be levelled and an attempt made to return the land to what it might have been prior to European settlement? Or should the white liberals just wait for Australia to fall into communist China, so that a really good society is created, as they see it? It is hard to work out their demands beyond the baby elites' desire for violence and assaulting police. And in a few years' time, these folk will rule us, no doubt growing up and becoming globalists. Better to follow Trump and dish out 10-year gaol terms, to put the evil day off.

The Cultural War Heats Up: Treaties

The Aboriginal recognition movement, was first said to be only a symbolic recognition of the existence of Aborigines, and it was advertised as only a decent thing to do, by enshrining this in the Constitution. Then, there was the movement, of changing sections of the Constitution which spoke of race, because, well, unless race is being used for affirmative action, races don't exist, and it is racist to think so, if you are white, and whites only exist for the purpose of needing to be shamed for past and continuing acts of racism. I argued in many articles, in detail, that this narrative was incoherent, and almost certainly we would soon see the real agenda behind Aboriginal recognition emerge.

It did not take long for talk of treaties, even separate nations, to emerge, although this was never completely invisible from the start. The mere change of the Constitution was not enough, for there must be a treaty, sovereignty land and financial agreements, a racial non-discrimination clause in the constitution, and reserved parliamentary seats for Aboriginals (The Australian, December 12, 2017, p. 1) State governments, such as South Australia began million dollar negotiations, called incorrectly "treaties" with indigenous communities. (The Australian, December 14, 2016, p. 1) Legal experts, have regarded this as just word play as state governments lack a treaty power: The Australian, December 16, 2017, p. 8.

The main problem here, as pointed out by Morgan Begg and Simon Breheny (IPA Review, December, 2016), is that the very idea of a treaty requires two (or more) sovereign states. The push for a treaty thus presupposes that Aborigines constitute a sovereign state. And that is simply incredible even in our politically correct cucked culture.

The historical record shows that Aborigines were tribal people, living in distinct tribes with distinct languages and territories. There was often violence between tribes: https://quadrant.org.au/opinion/bennelong-papers/2013/05/the-long-bloody-history-of-aboriginal-violence/.
This is not a criticism of Aboriginal society because European and Asian pre-history was probably even more violent and tribal. But, the point remains, that Aboriginal society was no more unified than was the European peoples in 10,000 BC. States did not exist.

Thus, Aboriginal society – and there is nothing wrong with this – was not organised into anything like a modern state, or even a pre-modern kingdom.
The supposition of a sovereign Aboriginal state presupposes even today, that there is some official Aboriginal government that represents the entire people, but what we have today are various community representatives, who, as far as I can see, have never been elected by some fair and democratic national election.
So, where is this sovereign state? Surely, it only exists as a figment of the radical feel-good imagination.

The pursuit of a separate Aboriginal state would require the break-up of Australia, as Keith Windschuttle argues in The Break-Up of Australia: The Real Agenda Behind Aboriginal Recognition, (Quadrant books, Sydney, 2016).

This is a long book which goes into great detail about the history behind these debates, but his central thesis is that the real agenda of Aboriginal constitutional recognition is to create a separate Aboriginal state, with the recognition vote being a launching pad. This is to vastly extend gains made since the Mabo case with native title.

The inside cover of Windschuttle's book has a map, with native title and claimant applications as of March 2016. At that time, 32 percent of the entire Australian land continent was subject to a native title determination and 31.7 percent, to an existing claim application.

Windschuttle argues that radical Aboriginalists do not merely want land, but see Australia as "our country," as the title of one book put it, presumably meaning that they own and have sole jurisdiction over what we call "Australia." The British settlement is a mere epiphenomenon, which they hope will pass into history, as they return to traditional life, law and values.

The basic argument of the Aboriginalists is that Australian courts have recognised that Aboriginal society had its own laws. The existence of such laws implies that Aboriginal sovereignty exists, which, because they were never conquered, remains unextinguished.
On this I see numerous problems, even at this level.

The mere existence of tribes with laws does not imply that sovereign states exist.

Further, for some odd reason, it has not been argued by conservatives that the Aboriginal people were conquered. Under international law of the time, if they were, they would certainly have had their sovereignty extinguished. Instead, the past Establishment went the way of terra nullius, "nobody's land," land which is not subject to the rule of a state.

While that is arguably true, it was easy for the politically correct court in Mabo to make the case against that. But, the entire "Invasion Day" rhetoric can be used as a tu quoque, for this would support the argument from conquest, and thus extinguish any state right, even if it existed in the first place.

There is something fundamentally wrong with British law if it did not extinguish native title. Did Norman law extinguish Anglo-Saxon law? Surely it did by conquest, which need not involve a battle of extermination, but at least would involve the destruction of the existing society and its laws and its replacement with the new. This happened in Australia with the British settlement.

A more detailed consideration of Windschuttle's book will be given next week. For the moment, we note that the recognition agenda fits into the elite's plans for dismantling traditional Australia. It is most unlikely that Aborigines will be permitted to abandon capitalism and return the country to pre-modernity. This is so at variance with the forces of economic globalisation that it is surprising that members of the Left do not start to suspect that something is fishy and that there may be an agenda behind even the Aboriginal recognition agenda.

Be that as it may, we now have the battle lines clearly drawn. A "No" vote is needed to disrupt the globalist plan to break-up Australia. The Establishment are determined to get their "Yes" vote, and it is a big thing for both Turnbull and Shorten.
It is a religion for the Greens.
Thus, the fight must be at the grassroots, and it needs to get serious. All groups, such as the anti-immigration and alternative economics groups need to join forces on this one, but the real victory will be by you, the ordinary reader convincing as many people as you can, to vote "No." We need to enter the battle if we are to keep our country. ***

THE UNITED NATIONS MUST COME A-TUMBLIN' DOWN by Michael Ferguson

Those of us who have been in this movement for a while know that the United Nations is evil and a threat to national sovereignty, aiming for a one world government, the New World Order. It has given us the foundation for legislation such as the Racial Discrimination Act and the tyrannical section 18 C. The UN is an anti-Northern European institution. But now something is being done about this. A US Republican-proposed House Resolution has proposed that the United States withdraw from the UN. And it gets better – another bill proposed that the US cut funding to the globalist monster: http://www.rt.com/usa/374754-us-leave-united-nations-bill/.

The UN would then have to get out of the building in New York.

The bill would also end any military and peacekeeping expenditures by the US and the UN's use of the US military for its diabolical purposes.

The proponents of the bill have said that the American taxpayer should not fund a globalist organisation that works against American interests. It would be good if Australians too could rise up against the UN, but we are behind the curve of history, which seems to be focussed on the US.

But America, if it does pull out of the UN, would deliver the kiss of death to this organisation, something long overdue. To quote Trump's line from his TV show The Apprentice: "United Nations: You're Fired!"

Next in Line: George Soros
Apart from the United Nations, Trump must deal with George Soros who has been conducting a cultural war against him. A recent article: http://collapse.news/2017-01-23-the-most-corrupt-imposter-of-all-time-george-soros-calls-trump-a-would-be-dictator-who-is-going-to-fail.html, notes that billionaire socialist George Soros said at the meeting of his financial tribe at Davos, Switzerland, that Trump was "an imposter and con man and would-be-dictator."

As the Collapse.news article says "Soros has been inciting riots and violence around the country, bankrolling groups and paying protesters to target cops, destroy private property and generally make the country as ungovernable as possible."

This is someone who should be put on trial for his complicity in the acts which he has financed. He is for more dangerous than the rampaging Leftists he finances. ***

THE CRYSTALS OF TIME by Brian Simpson

Time crystals have been created by two physics labs: http://www.sciencealert.com/scientists-have-just-announced-a-brand-new-form-of-matter-time-crystals. While most matter is in a state of equilibrium, time crystals are not. While ordinary matter may have a crystalline structure repeated in space, like diamonds, time crystals have a structure repeated in time: N. Y. Yao (et al.), "Discrete Time Crystals: Rigidity, Criticality, and Realizations", Physical Review Letters, January 20, 2017.

Time crystals are capable of perpetual motion without energy.

The physicist involved say that they don't see any applications for this except for quantum computing, but surely there is the possibility here of energy machines tapping into the source of perpetual motion.
I don't know how this could be done, but it is certainly worth exploring.

What a pity that our physics students in Australia are being dumbed down by "feminised" physics: http://www.smh.com.au/technology/sci-tech/australia-day-address-orator-michelle-simmons-horrified-at-feminised-physics-curriculum-20170124-gtxoi2.html. They could be working on superhero weapons. ***

WOULD THE NUKES EVEN WORK? by Brian Simpson

It seems that a malfunction occurred with a British nuclear missile, a Trident II DS missile fired from a nuclear submarine off the coast of Florida in June last year. The missile, which was unarmed at the time, veered in the wrong direction towards America. That obviously could have set off a global nuclear war. Downing Street covered the disaster up, until now, so that a House of Commons vote on the missile system would not be disrupted. Ah, corruption, it's everywhere.
Apart from that, it makes one wonder, if push comes to shove, would the nukes even work, especially if spare parts are needed from China? ***

WERE JAPANESE WORLD WAR II SOLDIERS AS HIGH AS KITES? by John Steele

One of the things I do is to get emails from a variety of geek sites because something useful might come up. Quoro.com is a bit too Left for my taste but sometimes something catches my eye before I hit the delete icon. In response to the question: "Which Weapon of Japan did U.S. Fear Most in WWII," William Tait MacDonald, resident of Japan replies: methamphetamine:

> "I noticed with interest that many of the people writing here have written about the Japanese soldier's willingness to die for their country, but have wrongly attributed it to love for Japan, love for the Emperor, honor, bushido or being just plain suicidal.
> The answer is far more interesting, and is relevant here because it was also one of Japan's greatest weapon.
> The answer is methamphetamine.
> Methamphetamine was a Japanese invention, first synthesised back in 1893 by Nagai Nagayoshi, a Japanese chemist, but was relatively obscure until World War II when the Japanese government began to mass produce crystal meth in quantities that would make Walter White blush, under the name hiropon::
> It was issued as part of the standard ration to everyone from soldiers to factory workers. For factory workers it suppressed hunger (no snack breaks!), gave them energy, and allowed them to focus on boring and repetitive tasks without losing concentration for insanely long periods. This contributed to Japan's incredibly high military-industrial output.
> The soldiers also received crystal meth, and this is probably the source of their reputation for great energy, ferocity and willingness to die. Simply put, they weren't any braver than the average Joe, they were just high as kites.
> Note that I am not denigrating the bravery or loyalty of the Japanese soldiers - even without drugs they were probably as committed to their country as the soldiers from the U.S. and other countries.
> What I am trying to debunk is this notion that persists in fiction and history that the key to the Japanese soldiers' amazing acts of bravery and suicidal ferocity can somehow be attributed to loyalty, bushido, bloodline or other such nonsense.
> They were probably brave, well-trained and loyal soldiers for the most part who were committed to their countries and their comrades, but one cannot ignore the fact that Japanese soldiers were high on crystal meth in most major engagements, and this explains their exceptional performance far more rationally and elegantly than any quasi-mystical ideas about bushido or samurai ancestry.
> It should also be noted that other countries toyed with giving their soldiers drugs - the Germans also used crystal meth and the U.S. gave their soldiers benzos - however no other nation did it to the extent that Japan did.
> In summary, one of Japan's most feared (and hidden) secret weapons was their wide-spread use of crystal meth during WW2."

If this is correct, could the drug use also explain the terrible aggression of the Japanese soldiers, because traditionally the Japanese have been a highly cultured people? ***
