THOUGHT FOR THE WEEK: "Any society - democratic, aristocratic, oligarchic, communistic - requires a moral order for its existence. Indeed, all societies arise originally out of religious belief; culture comes out of the cult. A society's moral order, for the most part, has for its foundation that society's religion. If a society has forgotten or repudiated its old religion, it must invent a pseudo-religion to supplant the old faith, and that society's morals are founded upon that pseudo-religion."

- Russell Kirk, American conservative writer.

WAR CRIME TRIAL OBSCENE: The whole concept of staging war crimes trials in Australia is obscene; it is a concept which runs contrary to the nation's basic heritage. An old man of Polish background, who has lived a quiet and law-abiding life all the years he has been in Australia, is being charged with crimes, not against Australians, but against Jews, which allegedly took place in another part of the world nearly fifty years ago. It is symbolic of the state of the nation when the announcement of Australia's first war crime trial came on Australia Day. Australia Day commemorates the birth of a new nation of British origins. Those Zionist Jews and others who have called for War Crimes Trials have demonstrated their rejection of the Christian foundations of the British judicial system. The "justice" they talk about is the same type of justice which Shakespeare's Shylock called for.

Australian society can only be poisoned by the spectacle of old men being forced to attempt to defend themselves about allegations which have their roots in events of so long ago that the testing of evidence in accordance with Australia's judicial traditions is impossible. Already the War Crimes business has been costly for the Australian taxpayers. If the Australian trials follow the pattern of what has been happening in Canada, taxpayers will be paying for astronomical costs as cases drag on for months. The Hawke Government, with little effective resistance from the Opposition Parties, introduced the War Crimes Amendment Act at the behest of the Zionist lobby, which has demonstrated that it is more concerned with advancing its own alien philosophy than in supporting the traditional Australian view, including that of those Australians who suffered at the hands of the Japanese, that perpetual hatred and calls for vengeance, are a destructive influence.

Hopefully the start of the War Crimes Trials in Australia will produce a healthy outrage from the overwhelming majority of the Australian people.

MFP: JAPANESE TROJAN HORSE, by D. Thompson. The news is at last beginning to break in the mass media (particularly print media) of the proposal - now three years old - for the establishment of a predominantly Japanese city-of-the-future in Australia. With very few exceptions, no Australian journalist or editor was aware of the MFP proposal in 1989. Even politicians, asked for information, had no idea that such a proposal even existed. It is significant that as the debate begins, there is no suggestion that Australians should be consulted about their wishes - the debate centres around where such a city or 'cities' should best be established.

THE VFT CONNECTION: The controversial proposal to build a Very Fast Train between Melbourne and Sydney is inextricably linked with the MFP. While the terms of reference of the Victorian VFT study exclude any reference to the MFP, those involved with the VFT consortium - Elders-IXL, BHP, TNT and the Japanese construction giant Kumagai - are attempting to "sell" the projects together. The VFT "Progress Report" published in October 1989 says: "Major potential exists for synergy between the MFP and the VFT... The communications link associated with the VFT could connect the MFP to global communications networks."

More significant is Sir Peter Abeles' view, published in the "Canberra Times" (8/12/88). Abeles, managing director of TNT and Ansett, as well as board member of the Reserve Bank, said: "I regard the train as only a catalyst for the rest, but the rest will have to fund the original capital costs; half the capital costs at least, and then one can start with a non-losing enterprise. If one does it purely as a train, it will never happen." Sir Peter's reference to "the rest" clearly means such projects as the MFP.

INJECTION OF AN ALIEN CULTURE: A preliminary feasibility study on the MFP was released last week, insisting that the city should be on a single site, should be largely funded by the Japanese, and have an eventual population of about 200,000 people (80% of them Japanese) to be viable. Sydney or Melbourne are the most likely sites. It is to be stressed that the new inhabitants of the city would not be temporary, but permanent.

It is totally unreasonable for Australians to expect a population of about 150,000 Japanese to come to live permanently in this country, leaving their culture behind them. The establishment of a new, high-tech 'city-of-the-future' is inseparable from the establishment of a large Japanese cultural enclave within Australia. The cultural cleavage between the two groups is immense. Virtually no discussion has taken place within Australia about whether Australians will accept such a massive injection of an alien culture. The majority will not.

THE JAPANESE MOTIVES: If Australia is prepared to sell their real estate - not to mention their heritage - for a mess of pottage, what is the Japanese motive? The published motives in the glossy propaganda are: "to contribute to world peace, economic development, environmental preservation and cultural exchange". Not even Mr. Peter McGuaran, Opposition spokesman on Science and Energy, believes this, saying "The Japanese will never transfer the genuine secrets of their economy to us."

Professor Yoshio Sugimoto, of La Trobe University, believes that at least on the surface, there are similarities between the MFP and an early Japanese experiment in building model societies. This took place in the conquered Manchuria in the early 1930s. Japan attempted to set up a multi-racial, harmonious society called Manchukuo. Professor Sugimoto says it was also to ensure the flow of resources to Japan from Manchuria. It is notable that such "experiments" are not tried in Japan!

The real Japanese motives for the MFP can only be understood in terms of future international trade. The Japanese fear that the developing trading bloc in North America, and the formalisation of the European Community in 1992 could deny Japan access to "markets". Without "markets" the Japanese "economic miracle" begins to crack. A Pacific Basin (Economic) Community is the Japanese answer to capture future "markets".

"The Economist" (12/7/89) asks questions concerning a new Pacific "Yen bloc": "Should Japan make the pace, or would it be better to let the front runner be Australia, whose Prime Minister, Mr. Bob Hawke, would like the role? Australia would be less distrusted than Japan as regional frontman by many Americans and Europeans - and other Asians.."

If a new Pacific Basin Community were established, the Japanese know that, diplomatically, they could not ask that it be centred in Japan - even their neighbours distrust them. However, a Japanese city in Australia, could be acceptable as the future financial, economic and political capital of the emerging Japanese Pacific Empire. The main Japanese motives for the MFP in Australia must be that of a Trojan Horse in our economic, political and (eventual) cultural colonisation by Tokyo.

SURRENDER OF SOUTH AFRICA: Last week's announcement by Mr. De Clerk, President of South Africa, that the 30-year ban on the ANC would be lifted, Nelson Mandela would be freed, and that the European South Africans would attempt to negotiate a "power sharing" arrangement with the ANC leadership, could signal the beginning of the end of the relative stability of Southern Africa. ANC leaders were joined by the Secretary-General of the South African Communist Party, Mr. Joe Slovo, to discuss their "strategy" following the announcement. The ban on the Communist Party has also been lifted.

It appears that the South Africans have been influenced by events in Eastern Europe in their handling of the ANC. If Communism as a power is "dead", then it may be safe for South Africa to make concessions to a dying moral force in order to placate the "international community's" demands for reform. But the ANC, as a terrorist movement, is clearly not "dead". Any negotiations with the convicted terrorist Nelson Mandela and the ANC can only proceed from a position of weakness, because such negotiations legitimise the use of terrorism as a means of negotiation. For thirty years the ANC has been training ideologically-motivated terrorists, who cannot now be represented by a "moderate" Mandela, even if such a person existed.

In his recent visit to Australia, former Rhodesian Prime Minister, Mr. Ian Smith, was asked what was his greatest mistake in dealing with the Rhodesian terrorists. Smith is reported as responding that the greatest mistake was to believe that power could be "shared" with those who could only be described as murderous butchers. There is no reason to believe that the South Africans could be any more successful sharing power with the terrorists of the ANC. Clearly, as a good Leninist, even Mr. Gorbachev intends to avoid wherever possible the idea that power should be "shared" in the Soviet Union.

THE COMING BLOODSHED: The South African Conservative Party is calling for an election to be fought on Mr. De Clerk's "reforms". Clearly, the large body of Africaners have not been consulted, and are yet to "have their say". If their leadership is perceived to have been "feeding the revolutionary crocodile" (hoping it will eat them last) with Rhodesia and South West Africa, the Africaners' frustration must inevitably boil over into violence, as their leadership progressively capitulates to ever-more far-reaching demands.

BASIC FUND: There has been a heartening response to our urgent appeal to supporters to help fill the Fund. If this continues, we hopefully will attain our minimum target of $65,000. Further details soon.....
