THOUGHT FOR THE WEEK: Social Credit, like all practical science, is a continual experiment. It seeks to ascertain with ever-increasing accuracy what are the desires of individuals, and how best they can be fulfilled. It repudiates all fixed ideas of what is good for people, and seeks to give them the fullest facilities for deciding and obtaining what they want.

For the application of any set of principles a mechanism is required, and there exist two which can be so modified as to reflect continuously the policy of individuals in association: the money system, or ticket system, and the voting system...

Those who administer it [the credit monopoly] are quite satisfied with the supreme control of governments and national policy that they have acquired, and with the ability to indulge in Utopian experiments that it confers. The problem they pose is that posed by the Wicked Husbandman in the parable.

BUSH TO PROP UP PLUNDERING BANKS AT PEOPLE'S EXPENSE by Betty Luks: Why am I not surprised to read that America's President Bush has agreed to 'back' the mortgage groups with the odd sounding names of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac? (Tom Bawden in New York, Times Online, 23/7/08)

"President Bush performed an abrupt U-turn today and dropped his opposition to a wide-ranging Housing Bill that would pave the way for a bailout of America's stricken mortgage industry. He did so as the House of Representatives and the Senate finally reached a deal on legislation that would permit the Government to back Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, the mortgage groups, in an emergency and to overhaul their supervision.

The Bill would also allow the Government to insure up to $300 billion (£150 billion) of refinanced mortgages and provide $3.9 billion to help the communities hit worst by the housing crisis by allowing local governments to buy and refurbish foreclosed homes.

Shortly before the House was expected to vote on the Bill, the President, who had said repeatedly that irresponsible homeowners and unscrupulous lenders should pay for their mistakes, announced a change of heart."

climate change. At present I have a thick wad of paper – about two inches thick with Ross Garnaut's predictions of climate doom unless we adopt his 'cap and trade emissions' scheme. I grew more confused reading these commentaries and at last threw all the articles on to my open fire – joyfully increasing carbon emissions.

Back to basics: the cap and trade model will involve permits being allocated or auctioned to emitters, which can be traded internationally. Sounds like another good scam for the corporates to extract more dollars from the long-suffering plebs – the way medieval torturers extracted teeth, perhaps.

The corporates will trade until their cash registers ring with joy, but the real costs of the carbon trade will be passed on to you and me, the ordinary consumer. Kevin "07" did not explain that an emissions trading scheme will mean massively rising energy costs and the loss of jobs. Carbon pricing means a carbon cost – for us. The scam of rising petrol prices, a result of the corporate/financial elites being a little greedier than usual, will be nothing compared to the scam of carbon trading.

ON 'SAVING' THE EARTH by Betty Luks: I thought of various headlines that included the acronym for the Carbon Reliance Abatement Program but decided against using it – hence the above. Piers Akerman used the acronym in his scathing article on the Rudd regime's carbon emissions proposals – "This CRAP won't save earth", Daily Telegraph, 16/7/08.

He wrote: "The Rudd Labor Government's newest program – the Carbon Reliance Abatement Program (CRAP) – makes no sense. It is a complex form of taxation designed to enhance the moral vanity of Prime Minister Kevin Rudd and those who believe Australia can make a difference to human-induced global warming.

Even if there were any evidence beyond the IPCC's faulty modelling to demonstrate that humans are responsible for global warming – which the last decade's weather would indicate has stalled or even reversed – it should be noted that Australia is responsible for approximately 1.3 per cent of the total anthropogenic global emissions...

The latest TAX burden on Australians: "CRAP is a new tax on the nation but the Government lacked the guts to call it what it is...there is no promise that the burden imposed on already crippled businesses and taxpayers by CRAP will be eased...

Under CRAP, every Australian will suffer an increase in the cost of living, though this will initially be massaged and lubricated to make it as painless as possible to those at the lower end of the income scale, those on $53,000. They will be compensated, in a fashion, for around five years (through the next election) at periodic intervals which Wong could not define.

Much has been made about a reduction in fuel excise to accommodate the CRAP cost on fuel, but this will just make it easier for the Government to increase its tax take in the future as it will be levying both the CRAP tax and the fuel levy on motorists.

Industries will be compensated but assistance will be reduced over time. Australians who think their action will somehow save the planet just because they've paid their CRAP taxes, should ask themselves who, if anybody, will pay for emissions on Australia's exports when they reach their destinations?..."

The Government claims its climate change policy is built on three pillars:

- Reducing Australia's greenhouse gas emissions
- Adapting to climate change that we cannot avoid
- Helping to shape a global solution that both protects the planet and advances Australia's long-term interests.

WHY DO THE ELITES DESPERATELY WANT OBAMA? by Brian Simpson: Like James Reed I am deeply concerned about Barak Hussein Obama becoming the US president. We all know that McCain also represents everything we see as destructive to national survival – but the Obama issue is different. What is disturbing, deeply disturbing, is the way that Obama, a man only in his position because of the propaganda value of his multiracial origin – has been given a dream run by the establishment press.

He has been taken as a new Martin Luther King, and a Black Kennedy, the pin-up boy of political correctness. Did you study the photos of the hysterical White faces at the Obama rallies? "Change we can believe in". What does that mean? It is like Beatlemania all over again.

If that is not a concern to conservatives, nothing is. Further, he, from his limited remarks about Australia hates us because of our historical treatment of Aborigines. Worried yet?

Obama is an opportunist who is owned by big business and international finance; a man loved by the birds of prey of Wall Street. His five top donors are corporate lobbyists, even though he constantly says that he is mainly financially supported by the grassroots.

Obama is above all, a media creation, proof that any shadow of democracy is dead in America. Democracy at a minimum requires a thinking citizenry, but people who behave in the hysterical fashion as do audiences at an Oprah how when she is giving away free items, do not embody rationality. People at Obama rallies have the same glazed-eye facial expressions as American fundamentalists at a faith-healing session.

The elites so desperately want Obama because having Obama elected is living proof that they can do anything. It is living proof, contrary to Abe Lincoln, that most of the people can be fooled most of the time. Australia has got Rudd, but America with Obama will finish off the world as we know it. Those with internet facilities, get on to Conservative and Christian websites. Urge Americans to fight for their very lives. There is a fate worse than Rudd and it is Barak Hussein Obama.

MIGRANT GRADUATE SCAM by James Reed: A study published in the academic journal People and Place by Monash University academics Bob Birrell and Ernest Healy (The Australian, 29/4/08, p.7) has found that less than a quarter of young degree-educated migrants find jobs in their areas of study. Many took degrees in accountancy but few became accountants. Among the non-English speaking background groups, only 16 per cent of young degree-educated Chinese worked in their area of study. As well, such graduates have minimal English and poor academic standards. Birrell and Healy conclude that the skilled immigration programme was failing to combat the skills crisis.

This is useful and damaging research. But behind it lurks questions these academics don't ask. Why is the programme continuing? Because it beefs up non-White immigration numbers as part of the unwritten government "Yellow Australia policy". If these young migrants were blue-eyed blondes, how quickly they would be sent packing.

THE DISASTER WHICH FOLLOWED THE MURDER OF THE TSAR: This last week an elderly Russian-Australian gentleman reminded me that it was 90 years since Russia's Royal Family had been murdered by the Soviets. Saddened that his people had allowed such a terrible thing to happen to the Royal Family he observed they paid a terrible price for their infatuated 'love affair' with Communism. It is thought that around 100 million people lost their lives under the Soviets.

David Flint in his Opinion Column wrote of that time: Lenin orders their murder... Ninety years ago, at around 2.30am on Thursday, 17 July 1918, Tsar Nicholas II, the Tsarina Alexandra, and their five children, including the Tsarevich, were cruelly murdered on the instructions of Lenin.

Remains thought to be those of most of the Imperial Family were discovered in 1991. Rigorous scientific testing, including a DNA sample provided by Prince Philip, Duke of Edinburgh, affirmed their authenticity. In a moving ceremony, on 17 July, 1998, the Tsar, Tsarina and the Grand Duchesses were reburied in the great Fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul in the city of St. Petersburg.

In an act of great courage and deep personal and national contrition, the then Russian President Boris Yeltsin had bowed his head before the coffin of the soon to be canonized Tsar Nicholas II. The President solemnly declared before Russia and the world that all the Russian people must atone for this "monstrous crime"...Russia, he said, had to end its "century of blood and lawlessness" with repentance and reconciliation.

"We all bear responsibility for the historical memory of the nation. That is why I could not fail to come here. I had to be here as both an individual and the president."

Condemning himself, as Communist Party chief at Yekaterinburg, where on direct orders from Moscow, he had supervised the destruction of the house where the imperial family was executed to prevent it becoming a monarchist shrine – he declared: "Guilty are those who committed this heinous crime and those who have been justifying it for decades – all of us. We must not lie to ourselves, explaining this senseless cruelty with political goals."

"This is our historic chance," he said. "On the eve of the third millennium we must do it for the sake of our generation and those to come. Let us remember those innocent victims who have fallen to hatred and violence. May they rest in peace..."

THE BOLSHEVIK COUP: And so David Flint continues: The Bolshevik coup was a disaster not only for Russia and the enslaved nations, but also for the whole world. In this column of 9 June, 2006, we reiterated the sometimes forgotten but irrefutable fact that prior to the First World War, economic development was well advanced in Russia, and the country was moving towards becoming a full constitutional monarchy. The First World War intervened, and in the course of it Lenin had been sent in a sealed train by the German High Command to foment unrest in the Russian Empire and thus disrupt the war effort. The war did not go well for Russia, so badly that the imperial government collapsed. Unable to win a majority in the parliament, the Bolsheviks waited until a crucial time and seized power, dispersing the democratic assembly. They proceeded to install one of the most brutal and absolute dictatorships known in modern history.

To those who would say it was worth it, Oleg Gordievsky, a former Colonel of the KGB, writes: "Russia under Nicholas II, with all the survivals of feudalism, had opposition political parties, independent trade unions and newspapers, a rather radical parliament and a modern legal system. Its agriculture was on the level of the USA, with industry rapidly approaching the Western European level.

"[In contrast] in the USSR there was total tyranny, no political liberties and practically no human rights. Its economy was not viable; agriculture was destroyed. The terror against the population reached a scope unprecedented in [human] history. No wonder many Russians look back at Tsarist Russia as a paradise lost."

The Russian Martyrs honoured in Cathedral of St. Peter and St. Paul, Sydney: The debate over Australia's constitutional future is not something which comes from the people, but a small elite. For much of the twentieth century another republican elite, funded by Soviet Communists, plotted to make Australia a republic. This was to be based on the East European and Soviet model. As we reported in our last column on the brutal murder of the Imperial Family by the same Soviet communists, and on the direct orders of Lenin, there are those apologists even today who say this terrible crime was worth it.
