THOUGHT FOR THE WEEK: "Accepting and not questioning the language and belief of the mainline media and party politicians, will not help to halt our deteriorating political affairs and enslavement. The recent election was the function of a democratic mechanism – it was not, and cannot be defined as democracy itself. Democratic government, as practiced in its beginning, was when the membership (the People) controlled and directed the executive. This mechanism can be observed on a national scale when referendums are held, which in effect, is the executive asking us for permission or direction. One thing needed at this time, to help halt the descent into more totalitarian government, is Australians demanding that, "The Rule of Law be restored!"

Sovietisation by stealth and the loss of the Rule of Law; From the Soviet revolution to every political assassination in Europe leading to WW2, the Mau Mau, China, Malaya and Vietnam and so to the IRA and now the Taliban and other terrorists groups, there has been one constant ingredient that has made it all possible and continuous, but never mentioned in the media. None of them had enough money to even buy a water pistol, until it was supplied to them for the purchase of arms and explosives. That ingredient is finance, or crudely put, Money. Other essential ingredients for success are, organisation, an objective, and recruitment of those psychologically suited – or conditioned – to the task of murder. This whole century of violence against civilisation has been perpetrated on the ground by the smallest-mind group that exists. They have no idea or intention of building. Their genes demand only destruction. But without organisation and money provided by well-concealed people, these vandals would have self-destructed as they had down the centuries before this political use was found for them. The force of the Lie, married to Financial force culminates finally in destructive Physical force. Our nation is not immune by isolation to these forces.

STRIPPING PRIVATE BANKS OF THE POWER TO 'CREATE' MONEY? The following communication has come from Mr. Ben Dyson of the U.K. He writes:

"Huge Progress in Parliament. Yesterday, Douglas Carswell MP (Conservative, Clacton) introduced legislation into the U.K. parliament that takes the first step towards ending fractional reserve banking. The bill would have the effect of making fractional reserve banking impossible, requiring a shift to full-reserve banking (where the bank either lends your money, or keeps it safe, but doesn't claim to do both at the same time!). In plain English, it would stop private banks being able to create money as debt.

The second reading of the bill will be on 19th November 2010 and we'll be in touch shortly once we've figured out the best way to push this bill ahead. It may require that we each get on the phone to our respective MPs.

2. A name change for Call4Reform: From today onwards, the Call4Reform campaign is now Positive Money. The new name will help us open more doors and work with more key people and organisations. For the next 18 months at least, we'll be making sure that everyone understands the problems with banking, and why fractional reserve banking has to end. We're working with MPs, think tanks, unions and academics, and over the next month we'll roll out the student and local campaigns, so if you want to spread the word in your area, watch this space. The new website is here: <http://www.positivemoney.org.uk/> ...

We hope our readers will not stop at the battle to strip the banks of their 'private' money creation. Read "The Enemy Within the Empire" by Eric D. Butler at <http://www.alor.org/Library/EnemyWithintheEmpire.htm#1a>

Important as it is, monetary reform for its own sake is not enough.

As noted in the Summer 2010 edition of "The Social Crediter": "To this day, the key institutions of modern society are modelled on the pyramidal, top-down hierarchical structures of the pre-modern era. In commercial, financial, political, educational and religious institutions, a coterie of men occupies the apex of power. Top positions are secured by those whose dominant motivation has been a personal ambition for worldly power or material wealth. As the American institutional economist Thorstein Veblen explains, the pattern was set in the prehistoric era, when dominant males competed physically for power, prestige and the symbols of worldly status.

In the meantime, women and low-status men developed the co-operative, technological, scientific and caring skills necessary to the nurturing and provisioning of mankind as a whole. All such truly economic activity – farming, production of food, clothing and shelter, caring for the land, nurturing plants and animals, creating useful artefacts, child rearing and production of the essentials of life – derives from the skills and expertise developed by low-status males and the women.

As individuals, we can remain in our personal 'comfort zones', continuing to work for 'the system', as we rear our families and make small improvements to our lifestyles and local communities as our personal resources allow. In short, we can watch from the sidelines as the catastrophe takes shape, prepared to pick up the pieces from what is left. Alternatively, we can look around thoughtfully at the institutions of society with a view to bringing about gradual but purposeful transformation..."

A must read: "Understanding the Financial System: Social Credit Rediscovered" by Frances Hutchinson. $35.00 plus postage from Heritage Book Services. As James Reed said in his review this is a truly magnificent book.

FEMINISM AND THE END OF MEN by James Reed: An article by Hanna Rosin in The Atlantic Summer 2010, "The End of Men" produces a wealth of statistics indicating that in economic terms women are dominating men. This appears to be a global trend, occurring even in India. It is a product ultimately of technology, which is something unquestioned by most people.

Technology advances, from the pill to power-steering have "freed" women from their traditional roles. Feminism, as an ideology, has legitimised women becoming key players in capitalism because women, in general, are more obedient workers. Women are excellent consumers and it is no surprise that the large department stores always have cosmetics at the entrance. No greenie will ever comment or critique the consumerist role of women.

Today even for conservatives to be critical of this work view is to "alienate readers".

In Australia conservative Christian magazines like Endeavour Forum maintain the rage. In the United States, "The Thinking Housewife" ><http://www.thinkinghousewife.com>< says things that I can't say. "Save the Males" ><http://www.henrymakow.com>< is equally hard hitting. But it is a drop in the ocean. The traditional world and traditional family has now been largely destroyed.

That, though, will spell the end of this evil and corrupt regime - and the sooner the better. As pointed out by S. Goldberg in "The Inevitability of Patriarchy", societies which attempt to tamper with the natural order always come to a sticky end. I believe that most of us will live to see the end of this suburban nightmare.

DID STEPHEN HAWKING CREATE HIMSELF? by Chris Knight: Celebrity physicist in the wheelchair with motor neurone disease, Stephen Hawking says in his new book "The Grand Design": "Because there is a law such as gravity, the Universe can and will create itself from nothing. Spontaneous creation is the reason there is something rather than nothing, why the Universe exists, why we exist." And: "It is not necessary to invoke God to light the blue touch paper and set the universe going".

Usually quantum mechanics is used when atheists want to pull the rabbit of the universe out of the hat of nothingness. Hawking I think has got his general relativity physics wrong. Gravity according to Einstein, and Hawking follows him, is a property of matter to bend space-time, and it is not an independent force. Thus "nothingness", meaning no matter, no gravity and no universe. The distinguished professor is talking nonsense. But it is nonsense which is selling books.

THE DARK SIDE OF REASON by Chris Knight: At various overseas websites a quiet debate has been bubbling on for some time about what amounts essentially to the limits or defects of the Enlightenment programme : an example is Fjordman "The Cult of Reason – The Dark Side of the Enlightenment" at ><http://www.brusselsjournal.com/node/4210><. My take in a nutshell is that reason has its place as a matter of the regulation of practical and technical life, but to subject God, Faith and religion to the mechanics of a logic best suited for building bridges and making machines, is a fallacy. Why should the entire universe be bound by the logic and mathematics of physics, as atheists such as Richard Dawkins and Stephen Hawking suppose? How can this requirement be justified in any non-circular fashion – that is what is begging the question in favour of scientific materialism? Clearly it cannot.

To suppose that God and His Ways, must conform to the positivistic reasoning of scientific materialism is an illusion produced by an arrogant culture, drunk on its own petty pride. But then, pride comes before a fall...

CAN'T BE JEW AND CHRISTIAN AT THE SAME TIME by Betty Luks: It seems to this writer that many authors have accepted 'history as written' by modern authors without much thought as to what they are claiming. Fjordman in "The Cult of Reason – The Dark Side of the Enlightenment" writes: "In some Western countries – the United States in particular – the term "Judeo-Christian" is frequently evoked. This makes sense in some contexts but not in all... Although Christianity was deeply affected by its Greco-Roman and Germanic environment, there is no doubt that it adopted a number of important philosophical ideas and ethical concepts that were uniquely Judaic and had no real precedent in pagan European religions, for instance the idea of history as a linear process of progress toward a specific end goal.

Author Henry Bamford Parkes writes in "Gods and Men – The Origins of Western Culture": "The most significant feature of the Jewish heritage, however, was its view of history. Other ancient peoples had believed in a golden age, but had always located it in the past at the beginning of time.

Israel alone looked forward to a golden age in the future and interpreted history as a meaningful and progressive movement toward this Messianic consummation.

Originating in tribalistic loyalty, and reflecting the determination of a weak people to retain its identity in spite of conquest and enslavement, the Messianic hope was given universal scope by the prophets and became the end toward which all earthly events were moving. In various manifestations, religious and secular, spiritual and materialistic, it became one of those dynamic social myths which give meaning and direction to human life and which have more influence on human action than any rational philosophy. Unless its importance is understood, the development not merely of the Jewish "people but also of the whole Western world becomes unintelligible...."

As to the 'golden age' that is claimed ancient Israel looked forward to, I think the matter has to be looked into more deeply. The following letter, originally published in The Edmonton Journal (Canada), Wednesday, December 31, 1997, would not have it as the above author claims.

"The article about Bayt Moshiah and the "Messianic Jews" neglected to mention one very important fact: it has nothing to do with Judaism. (One family's reconciliation with tradition and a tree, The Journal, Dec. 13).

True Jews do not have the option of celebrating either Christmas or Hannukkah. One holiday is Christian, the other Jewish. They are not interchangeable.

True Jews do not believe that Jesus of Nazareth was the messiah. Indeed, when Jews and Christians use the term "messiah" we are talking about two different concepts. True Jews do not incorporate Christian Scripture into their Bible.

Most important of all, the theologies of Christianity and Judaism, despite some shared scriptural and ethical heritage, are incompatible. It is not possible to be both Christian and Jew at the same time - a misguided impression which your article clearly gives to your readers.

As for Jews who populate the Messianic congregations, in the eyes of the Jewish world they are, at the very least, misguided. At the very worst they are apostates. So-called Messianic Judaism is an anathema to the Jewish people. To continue to present it as anything else is a disservice to the Jewish population of this city. More important, it is a gross misleading of your readership. Frankly, we all deserve better.

THE ISLAMISATION OF PARIS: SHAPE OF THINGS TO COME? by James Reed: Take a deep breath and have a peep at what some believe is Europe's future, and perhaps our own. In Paris a private security force guards streets where large crowds of Muslims gather. The police have been ordered not to intervene. A Frenchman has posted on You Tube, under the alias of "Maxime Lepante" videos of the Islamisation of Paris. The videos show the illegal blocking of streets by Muslims with barriers and praying in the streets. Maxime Lepante observed cars coming from all over Paris bringing more Muslims: "They are coming there to show that they can take over some French streets to show that they can conquer a part of French territory", Lepante has said (Source <http://www.amnation.com/vfr/archives/017231.html>).

Oh come now Mr. Maxime Lepante, wherever did you get that idea from? And how will you feel when a Muslim French president has control of French nuclear weapons?
