

Healing a Divided Nation, Land Rights:

An Aboriginal Perspective (Rev. C. Jacobs M.B.E.)

Sharing was one of the virtues of Aboriginal societies. While Aborigines had little more than the bare necessities of life before the Europeans came, neither did they have anything resembling debt.

The real costs of doing anything, such as making a boomerang, were met at the time. The real cost of building anything is surely the materials and energies expended. Before the Europeans came the Aborigines owed nothing to anyone.

Behind Marxism (F. L. Britton)

To understand the total problem of Communism it is necessary that we trace the course of the movement from its beginning down to the present. We must gain some idea as to the forces, which influenced and shaped their philosophy.

In this work we decided to breach the wall of silence at whatever cost, and to treat the subject as fairly and as honestly as we know how.

Major Clifford Hugh Douglas,

M.I.Mech.E., M.I.E.E., consulting engineer, economist, author, and founder of the Douglas Social Credit Movement, was born in 1879 and died in 1952. Among other posts which he held in his earlier years were those of engineer with the —

Factory Farnborough (GB).

R.A.F. (Reserve).

After retiring from his engineering career, he and his wife ran a small yacht-building yard on Southampton Water for several years. The combination of beauty with functional efficiency in a successfully designed racing yacht had a special appeal for him.

When he lived in an old water-mill in Hampshire he used the water-wheel to turn a dynamo which lit and warmed the house as well as providing power for lathes and other tools. Later, when he moved to Scotland, many of his friends and followers remember helping to build his small hydro-electric-powered house, sited on the local burn which ran through his land. Since decentralisation of economic power was of the essence of his teaching, it should be put on record that he practised what he preached.

One of his most interesting jobs, just before the 1914 War, was that of conducting preliminary experimental work and preparing plans and specifications for the electrical work on the London Post Office Railway, with later supervision of the installation of plant in what was to be one of the earliest examples of complete automation in the history of engineering.

From Economic Democracy First edition (1920), by CH Douglas

Institutions exist to serve Individuals

Accepting this statement (systems were made for man, and not men for systems)

as a basis of constructive effort, it seems clear that all forms, whether of government, industry or society must exist contingently to the furtherance of the principles contained in it. If a State system can be shown to be inimical to them it must go;

if social customs hamper their continuous expansion - they must be modified; if unbridled industrialism checks their growth, then industrialism must be reined in.

That is to say, we must build up from the individual, not down from the State.
